ATTIVITÀ PROGETTUALE

Anno	Progetto
2020	Choosing Employment Protection: the role of On-the-Job search and Ability Learning, Job Market Paper  Why would agents insert employment protection in labour contracts? In this work, I show that in a Diamond-Mortensen-Pissarides search and matching model with on-the-job search and heterogeneous match-productivity, firms and workers could choose employment protection to improve their joint welfare by reducing workers' search intensity. I use this model to explain the coexistence of fixed-term contracts and open-ended contracts in continental Europe, introducing Bayesian learning about worker's unobserved ability to match some important feature of the distribution of fixed-term contracts among the workforce. I calibrate the model using Italian administrative data and I perform welfare comparisons between possibly different Employment Protection Legislations, showing that the endogenous nature of the contractual choice plays an important role in the welfare gains of heterogeneous agents.
2020	Labour Mobility of Heterogeneous Workers in the European Union with Simon Görlach In the presence of price rigidities, labor migration can help to mitigate the burden of asymmetric shocks across countries in a currency union. However, heterogeneity in workers' productivity and their preference for migration may thwart the potential of labor mobility to absorb asymmetric shocks. We develop a dynamic equilibrium model in which firms match with workers of different skill levels and taste for different countries. We calibrate this model to data from the European Labour Force Survey, and find that migration primarily mitigates the effects of a negative shock on labor market outcomes for high skilled workers, whereas negative effects on wages may actually be amplified for low skilled workers.
2020	Third Party interest, Resource Value and the Likelihood of Conflict with Giacomo Battiston and Matteo Bizzarri  We build a model of resource war to investigate the impact of a change in the resource value on the likelihood of a conflict. A predator decides if to wage war against a resource holder and seize its resource. A powerful third party can intervene to back the defendant. However, it does not act as a social planner but it maximizes its own profits. Then, the effect of a change in resource value is a priori unclear. On the one hand, increased resource value results in a higher incentive to predate, on the other hand it makes for a higher incentive to intervene by the third party, increasing deterrence. Under general assumptions, we find that the probability of a conflict as a function resource value is hump-shaped. We test our prediction using data on interstate and civil war.
